Description

ACHLI - Associação de Conservação do Habitat do Lobo Ibérico (Association of conservation of the habitat of the Iberian wolf) is a non-profit association created in 2006 by a group of companies related to the implementation of wind projects. The aim is to preserve the iberic wolf habitat.

ACHLI seeks to receive, within the scope of its activity, the active contribution of various sectors of society, from public bodies linked to the defense of the Environment, through local authorities, by the promoters of large renewable energy projects and also by the populations of the area and all private associations linked to the conservation of the environment and the Iberian Wolf.

ACHLI's mission is carried out through the development of projects that seek to represent added value for the conservation of the Iberian wolf's habitat. All projects take into account the current state of the packs for the areas where they are planned, as well as their socio-economic environment, an aspect that is often decisive for the success of their implementation.

Goals

ACHLI's mission is to contribute to the preservation of the natural and cultural landscape of sensitive areas in the national territory, particularly in areas where the presence of the Iberian Wolf is detected.

Activities

- Management of forest spaces for conservation
- Creation of areas without hunting activity
- Measures to minimize the impact of Lobo on livestock
